

Androids

Beginning of transition...It was the year 2225. I born in the year 2200, and that was the year my mother went missing.

I was working on the ship's mainframe when a guy named John walks in and randomly says, "We may know what happened to your mother." I couldn't believe it.

We were riding in the St. Louis Space Shuttle up near Jupiter. It looked a bit damaged. John, Taylor and I were heading in when a huge explosion happened. I lost John and Taylor, and I was by myself, so I explored the ship a little. There was blood everywhere. I yelled out, "What in the world happened?" This guy by the name of Carter appears out of nowhere and attempted asked if he could help me, so we explored the ship some more. While trying to stay quiet, we heard two guys talking about some sort of alien creature aboard this ship. Once they passed by, we crept up from behind and followed them. Then, in an instant, we lost them. Carter told me to start up the power at the bottom of the ship. Once we were down there, we saw a woman and two guys near the switch. I had to sneak to reboot the power without them seeing me. We quickly tried to get out, and when we stopped, as we were gasping in relief, I noticed something was dripping on Carter's shoulder. I reluctantly asked, "Is that saliva?" Before he could answer, whatever it was swiped Carter into the vent and ate him. Luckily, I got away without the creature seeing me. I caught a glimpse of it running, and I realized it was an Android. Something was wrong. The androids were not functioning right, and they were killing anything in sight.

Meanwhile, I still have yet to find John and Taylor. I needed to know they were alive, take them with me, and get off this ship. I needed to find something that would lead me to them. As I was looking around, I was in grave danger. These Android creatures were after me left and right, but I was too fast and too swift for them. I spotted two space police, and there they were! John and Taylor were with the space police and very much alive! I quickly grabbed them and ran over to turn off all the doors on the other side of the ship. Just as I thought the doors were closing, John hit a button and bailed out. I had no idea why, and again, I needed to find him. Taylor followed behind me to begin the new search for John. I spotted him about 50ft away, and as I got closer, just as I was about to yell at him for pulling such a stunt, he said, "Listen! The creature was in the ship. I couldn't say anything, but I was hoping you would follow my lead. If the doors closed, we all would have been trapped with the creature and probably dead. Say thank you later, and let's get outta here!"

We went back to the space police office to get some help. No police were there, but there was one guy named Cristiano. He said he could help us. We had no choice but to trust him. We needed his help to trap the creature.

As we were approaching the ship, we saw the Android attempting to blow up the ship by overriding the engine. This could cause it to blow up like a nuke and destroying the whole ship. We stopped them, but not before part of the ship was destroyed. Everything was going haywire, the Androids killed everybody. I was the lone survivor with no one to help me.

When the smoke cleared, I found a computer, but it wasn't one I had seen before. I swiped the screen, and a voice I recognized started playing. It was my mother. Could this be really happening? "Hey, Baby. It's Mommy. It's been a while since I've been away. I was in a bad situation on the St. Louis, and I'm not going to make it home, Baby. I am so sorry. Take care of yourself." I cried, but only for a little while. I had to live; I had to live for my mother.

Kameron D-M.

I needed to get this ship operable again, but somehow, I had to figure out how to override the mainframe. This was going to be a difficult task. The Androids had repopulated its species, and more of them were after me, so I need to hurry. I grabbed my space suit and headed for the ship. I went in to hyper speed with five creatures following me. I crossed the bridge in, what felt like, one leap! I darted into the ship, pulled up the mainframe, made some adjustments, and much to my relief, the doors were closing with the Androids far behind; so I thought. Just as the door was almost shut, one of them managed to reach in. "Not this time, Android!" I yelled. I freighted I back up and pressed the launch button, and before I knew it, I was in space with no Android to follow. To this day, if this transition is found by anyone, be careful. The Androids are alive.