

Ice Skating Horse

Kassia P.

Once there lived a baby horse named Dolly. She wanted to be a chef all her life. When she got older, she applied for a job at the “Polar Express”. She was twirling and jumping all over the train just as the magical waiters do. One day she was twirling like she was a champion on the Winter Olympics. After they dropped the kids at the North Pole, her boss who saw her twirling said, “Hey Dolly, you should try out for America’s Got Talent. You could be the skating horse or even The Ice-Skating Horse.” Dolly, being an innocent horse, she didn’t know how big of a deal this was. She of course said yes, but after practicing and practicing she soon realize that ice skating was hard. She loved those who would dance like a star but hated those who do as bad as her because she just wouldn’t try again. One day she saw a video about ice skating and figured out what she was doing wrong. She wasn’t embracing her emotions. Then and there, she had the courage to overcome the challenge. She went on America’s Got Talent with emotion ready to come through and her boss as her motivator. She skated with pride and was unfearful, but when it came to the judges she was as scared as a person getting robbed. She was very surprised when Simon Cowell, the hardest judge to impress, stood tall on his two feet, clapped his hands over and over again, and hit the Golden Buzzer. Dolly was so cheerful that she slipped on her four hooves and fell. She got up while Simon came up stage to hug Dolly. She was beaming with excitement. Simon even said, “I just might give you the opportunity to go to the Winter Olympics.” Those words gave Dolly delight that might happen in the future and what might be her career.
